In Tilt, the artist added more nuances to create a tighter composition. The work is a fictional scene that embodies many aspects of his cityscape techniques - tone, perspective, leading lines, the interplay of it all, and how painterly techniques made in the studio create an expression of what a city scene looks and more importantly, feels like to him. Many parts of the painting are left loose, disjointed, and fragmented - balanced well enough without the entire piece falling apart. Everything is painted deliberately, yet at the same time allows enough room for surprises and beautiful mistakes to arise.
